A Word From the Publisher

There was a time not so long ago when if you needed something shipped, you called a trucking company and worked out the arrangements as best you could.

Nowadays, it's quite possible that your first call will not be to a freight carrier but rather to a logistics company that may have no freight-hauling assets but has connections to those who do.

It's this change, made possible by the application of technology and a burst of innovation on the part of new business owners, that is driving incredible growth in the market for third-party logistics services.

In this year's edition of the Top 50 Logistics Companies, senior features writer Daniel P. Bearth explores the boundaries between trucking and logistics and finds the lines increasingly blurred.

Dealing with trucking companies has never been as simple as it appears. Now, more than ever, it seems that freight carriers are driven by operational concerns. To be successful, fleets must be more selective about where they go and what they haul, because drivers are in short supply and the cost of buying and maintaining new equipment has risen.

And shippers, who may have once had traffic managers on staff to help sort out their transportation options, are finding a whole new universe of transportation intermediaries at their door eager to help: brokerage firms that match loads with trucks, forwarders that acquire freight-hauling capacity from air and ocean carriers, warehousing and distribution companies that manage inventory and truck operators that supply dedicated capacity and specialized delivery services.

The growth of third-party logistics services is changing the very nature of trucking.

Two of the country's best-known trucking companies — J.B. Hunt Transport Services and Schneider National Inc. — now rank among the largest logistics companies in North America. J.B. Hunt ranks No. 2, and Schneider National ranks No. 10 on the Top 50 list. Both companies have bolstered their logistics credentials by expanding intermodal, freight brokerage and dedicated contract carriage services.

Much of the change is being driven by private investors who are pouring money into logistics firms and, in the process, creating organizations capable of providing all kinds of transportation services.

Among the most aggressive players in the market is XPO Logistics Chairman Bradley Jacobs.

Jacobs founded and built up four successful companies — Amerex Oil Associates, Hamilton Resources, United Waste and United Rentals — before turning his attention to the logistics industry with the purchase of Express-1 Solutions in September 2011. He since has acquired eight companies and started up 18 new operations. His goal is to turn XPO into a multibillion-dollar company within a few years.

In a recent presentation to financial backers, Jacobs explained why he picked logistics as his next big investment.

“Let's start with size,” he said. “Logistics worldwide is more than $3 trillion in annual revenue. In the United States alone, it's about a trillion dollars.”

Furthermore, Jacobs said, the logistics pie is expanding. “It makes economic sense for most companies to utilize third-party logistics services,” he explained. “Instead of using internal staff to find freight or capacity, shippers and carriers are increasingly using brokers.”

The logistics industry also is highly fragmented, Jacobs said, with more than 10,000 licensed brokers but fewer than 25 with annual revenue of more than $200 million.

While investors are staking a claim in the industry, so, too, are entrepreneurs. Tommy Skinner, a former transportation manager, launched Shift Freight to provide less-than-truckload freight service for logistics companies. Shift Freight is growing at warp speed, and so are many other aggressive, tech-savvy firms that seem to be filling an important role in meeting the needs of shippers and carriers.

We believe this combination of investment and initiative will continue to drive the growth of logistics and reshape the Top 50 Logistics Companies list for years to come.
